You will see an.Q: Can I set the property of the global object directly in a module? I want to assign a property to the global object within a module in order to make a global variable. Can I do this? var module = (function () { ... // Can I change this so that module.a is defined? ... }()); I am working in a Browser environment. I have a set of variables which are used throughout the module, and I want to set these variables for the purpose of reducing code repetition. I don't see any good reason to write a module.a = this.a; as that means every single time I refer to module.a, it will always refer to the same thing, instead of its own separate variable. A: Not directly, no. It's not much of an optimization. Using module.a would also make no sense, since it's scoped to the module, not to the whole file. I suggest using private variables, and providing APIs on your module to access these variables. var module = (function () { var a = 4; function getA() { return a; } function setA(newValue) { a = newValue; } return { getA: getA, setA: setA }; }()); A new approach to community assessment in a rural region: some results. A method developed to assess the impact of the mental health programs in a rural region of central New York State has been described. Baseline data were collected from both program and non-program areas. In f678ea9f9e
